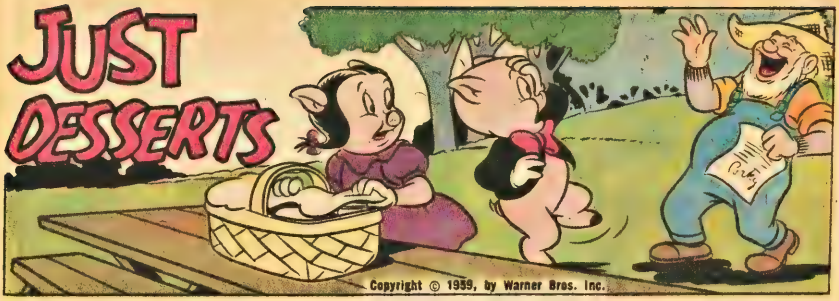
JUST DESSERTS



"A picnic?" Porky Pig crowed with delight one day as he talked to Petunia on the telephone. "I'll say I'd like to go!"

"You really are anxious, aren't you?" Petunia giggled. "Well, we're going up to old Mr. Codger's property tomorrow, and . . ."

"Codger's property!" Porky echoed with surprise. "He chases everybody away from his place with a shotgun. Someday, though, he's going to get his just desserts!"

"I've talked with him and everything has been arranged," Petunia assured Porky. "We can use his place, and all he asks in return is one little favor. He'll tell us about that, tomorrow."

"I knew there would be a catch," Porky groaned. "That old skinflint never gave away anything in his whole life."

The following morning, Porky and Petunia arrived at Mr. Codger's farmhouse.

"All you have to do is chop some wood out in back," Mr. Codger smiled slyly. "And in return, you and your friends may use my property as picnic grounds for a whole year."

"G-golly, that's wonderful!"

"I'm glad you think so," Mr. Codger crooned softly. "Now if you'll just sign this little paper—it's an agreement of what we've been talking about—you can get started right away."

Porky glanced at the paper briefly and signed his name.

"Good!" Mr. Codger cackled in his high, piercing laugh. "Now I've trapped you!"

"Huh?" Porky gulped.

"That wood I want you to chop out in back is the whole forest on my property!" Mr. Codger shrieked with glee. "It'll take you a year to chop it all down."

Porky and Petunia were so depressed by this news that they were hardly able to enjoy their picnic at all. But, as they were on their way home, an idea suddenly came to Porky. "Pack up for another picnic tomorrow, Petunia," he advised. "I've just thought of a way to beat old Codger at his own game."

The next day, Mr. Codger was awakened by the ringing of axes and the buzzing of saws. Flinging on a robe, he leaped to the window, and the sight that met his eyes was truly amazing. Almost every foot of his property was covered with people, all busy chopping or sawing down trees.

"What's the big idea?" he demanded.

"It says in our agreement that I can bring any of my friends along for a picnic," Porky reminded him. "And, since I know almost everybody in the whole town," he grinned, "I've invited them all so that we can get this wood-chopping job done at once and have the rest of the year just for picnicking."

"But I can't possibly use that much wood all at once," Mr. Codger protested.

"That's what you get for trying to be so tricky," Porky grinned. "You're finally getting your just desserts."

"And speaking of just desserts," Petunia spoke up, "why don't you join us for some picnic dessert, Mr. Codger?"

"Well, now," Mr. Codger relented as he spied a nice plump pie in Petunia's picnic hamper, "maybe being surrounded by picnickers for a year or so won't be so bad after all, if this is the way I'll be treated."

"S-say! Everything is working out perfectly," Porky laughed. "But, somehow, I didn't think that when you got your just desserts, it would be such a happy occasion."
